Our Migrant Families

Do you sometimes feel caught between two cultures, the world of your parents and the world of your children?

Second generation migrant families often receive tremendous support from their parents, relatives and community. With this support can come expectations about how couples should relate to each other, parent children and commit to their family of origin.

Negotiating between cultures and changing the way we behave and relate may cause conflict. This seminar explores some of the hot topics while encouraging parents to choose how they want to maintain their culture while bringing up children in a complex, modern Australia.

The course aims to:

- identify the benefits of living between two (or more) cultures
- support participants to identify issues that are causing conflict within their family
- explore what is strong and build on it
- develop strategies to address conflict within the family
- strengthen intergenerational relationships
- improve communication within the family
- explore ways that families can maintain their culture.
